

COLLEGE REPORT

By ROBERT M. BERSI

One hundred and six years ago, Yale gave the first American Ph.D., but until the beginning of the First World War the majority of young Americans who aspired to be scholars or scientists went abroad to study, chiefly to Germany. There they learned about the vital significance of research, a function which American institutions of higher education had all but ignored until well after the Civil War.

Research has such fabulous prestige today that people generally believe that it has deep roots in American universities, but the fact is that it did not begin to be recognized as significant, never mind essential, until the opening of Johns Hopkins University in 1876.

That same year the United States celebrated its first 100 years as a nation, and one of the writers of an article in a series reviewing the state of American affairs observed that the United States had not at that time a single scientist of first rank. Another writer reported that only one American journal devoted to pure science had been established, and one of the few Harvard professors who undertook research told President Eliot (of Harvard) that he had to write up his findings in German for publication in a German chemical journal if he wanted them published at all. In short, research had low status and scant support in this country.

THE GREAT majority of American professors and administrators at the time agreed with Benjamin Jowett, the famous headmaster of Balliol College, Oxford, who scoffed: "Research! A mere excuse for idleness; it never achieved, and never will achieve, any results of the slightest value."

Johns Hopkins, Chicago, Stanford, and other newly established universities combated this short-sighted point of view; and so did the older institutions on the eastern seaboard. As late as 1909, however, a scientist wrote the University of Minnesota that "the regents generally regarded science as a private fad of a professor, like collecting etchings or playing the piano, and they rarely interfered with it so long as he did not ask for money."

Today, in contrast, money for research flows into colleges and universities in such colossal quantities from foundations, government, and industry that research threatens to swamp the no-less-important teaching function.

TODAY, through fundamental research, our colleges and universities produce the bulk of the new basic knowledge needed for understanding the universe and man and for improving the standard of living.

As I indicated earlier, the United States once lagged in both the research productivity; but now it has a firm grip on first place in both the physical and biological sciences. During the first decade
